LOOKING AFTER YOUR MENTAL HEALTH

Talk to someone you trust

Let someone know how you feel. Talking can help you to unload how you're feeling and is often the first step to tackling your issue.

Talk to someone who you trust and think will support you - this could be a friend, family member, No Limits worker, teacher or someone else.

Take baby steps

When you feel low, everything is 10 times harder than usual. Make sure you take things slowly and feel proud of every small thing you do. Don't beat yourself up if you think you haven't done much - each small step is positive. Even simple tasks like getting out of bed, having a drink or cleaning your teeth can be challenging. However, they are all good achievements.

Soothing things

If you are feeling low or need a bit of a recharge, having some activities or things to go to that you know will comfort you can help. Try writing a list or making a self-soothe box and think about what you could include, like listening to music, something that smells nice, a special teddy or blanket to hold.

Prioritise yourself

It's important to look after ourselves and sometimes that might mean making a decision for yourself instead of others. If you need time to yourself to relax and de-stress, you should give yourself that time. You don't have to say yes to everything and you won't be letting people down.

Look after your physical health

Eating a balanced diet gives our body the right nutrients to be able to function properly, which is important when trying to maintain positive mental health and have enough energy each day.

Getting your body moving can also help, even if it's just a little bit. Movement makes your body release endorphins, serotonin and dopamine, which all make you feel better.

By making gradual changes to your lifestyle, you'll find it easier to adjust slowly, rather than throwing yourself in at the deep end.

Make sure you're also getting enough sleep, too, as not getting enough contributes to feeling low. Try and aim for eight hours a night.

Try mindfulness

Mindfulness is taking time to focus on the present moment, giving our minds a bit of a break from the business and stresses of everyday life. It can reduce our anxiety and stress levels as well as improving our overall health.

If you don't feel ready to talk to someone, a good alternative that still helps you get your feelings out is journalling or keeping a mood diary. Lots of people find that they are more able to understand or let go of feelings once they've written them down.

It is also a good way to track your emotions over time and they can also help you to think of any good things that have happened that day.

TIPS FOR MANAGING ANXIETY AND LOW MOOD

If you ever find yourself needing a way to cope with the immediate future, try some of these:

Breathing techniques

Square breathing

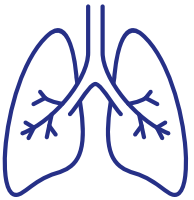
Start by breathing in and follow round until you start to feel relaxed.

Breathe in to the count of four

Hold to the count of four

Breathe out to the count of four

Pause to the count of four



Five finger breathing

Slowly trace round each of the fingers on one hand with a finger from the other. Breathe in on the way up the finger and breathe out on the way down.

Grounding technique

5 Name five things you can see

4 Name four things you can feel

3 Name three things you can hear

2 Name two things you can smell

1 Name one thing you can taste

MENTAL HEALTH PAIN SCALE

This scale can help you to let others how you are feeling emotionally, and what your immediate needs are. Use it to help you explain to your parents, professionals, and other people in your life.

MILD	1	Everything is just right! There's nothing wrong at all and you feel great!
	2	You might be a bit frustrated or disappointed but it isn't going to ruin your day. You'll cheer up soon.
	3	Something might be bothering you, like being overtired or hungry, but you're doing okay.
MODERATE	4	It's been a bad day or a bad few days. But you know you'll get through it. Take care of yourself.
	5	Your mental health is starting to impact on your normal life. Easy things are getting harder. You should talk to someone.
	6	You can't do things you'd usually do because of your mental health. You're getting impulsive and compulsive thoughts that are hard to get rid of.
SEVERE	7	You're avoiding doing things that might make you feel even worse, but this isn't good. You definitely need to talk to someone, it's getting serious.
	8	You can't hide it any longer. You might have issues with things like eating, sleeping, school, having fun with friends and family. Your mental health is affecting almost every part of your life.
	9	You're at a critical point. You aren't functioning properly anymore. Negative thoughts and feelings are constant and you don't know what to do. You may be at risk if you don't get support.
	10	You're experiencing the worst emotional distress possible. Things can't get any worse and you can't see it getting better. You feel like this is it. You need to contact a crisis line immediately.
