SYNOPSIS

Why do we fail to listen? Because we are rarely present; we listen through a thick wall of past judgments, defensive reactions, and the restless urge to reply. In these profound dialogues, J Krishnamurti reveals that real listening is not a passive social courtesy, but a radical act of total attention. When we clear the internal noise of conditioning then hearing, seeing, and action become one single movement—freeing us from the friction of assumptions. For us, true listening is not a soft skill learned in a textbook; it is the ultimate masterclass in presence, psychological space, clarity, and unconditioned decision-making.
