SYNOPSIS

Exploring the nature, limits, and proper role of human thought. Thought is shown to be a response of past memory and limited knowledge, rather than an independent or creative activity. When thought operates in the psychological realm, it builds mental images of ourselves and others that distort reality, causing conflict and division in human relationships. However, intellectual thinking has a necessary and vital role in practical life, such as technical skills, science, and everyday tasks. True mental clarity and harmony arise when thought stays strictly within its practical sphere, allowing human connections to be based on direct perception rather than past conditioning. This programme invites you to engage in deep self-inquiry on what is the right place of thought to uncover psychological freedom.
