Want to be part of British APCO?

The British Association for Public Safety Communications Officials was founded in 1993, and became a registered charity in 2018. We bring together all parts of the UK emergency services and critical communications sector to drive change and innovation in order to improve public safety and security. We promote next generation emergency communications, services, networks and systems. We also foster strong international links through our affiliation with the Collaborative Coalition for International Public Safety (CC:IPS). This global alliance of public safety organisations is improving emergency communication systems that serve nearly one billion people worldwide.

If you would like to learn more about improvements to critical communications, please apply to join the British APCO community.

Membership of British APCO is open to:

- Public safety and first responder staff, serving or retired
- Government and military professionals associated with resilience and public safety
- Highways, utilities and other critical infrastructure professionals with a public safety remit
- Volunteers with public safety and first responder organisations
- Companies using or developing public safety IT and communications technology
- Individuals employed as a provider or goods or services to the public safety community
- Academics researching or studying in relevant fields
- Early career professional interested in public safety digital trends and mentorship opportunities
